

Alive Yet Unfelt

The day she stepped into my life,
Was the dawn that made me alive.
She was sunlight on a shadowed face,
A melody in an empty space.
She taught me how to breathe anew,
To laugh with joy and smile so true.

But when she left, my world turned gray,
My heart forgot its beat that day.
In the silence of the night, I find my song,
A melody of longing, where I belong.
For in every beat, her memory remains,
A love that lingers, through all the pains.

She showed me tears, bitter and raw,
And smiles that felt like fragile straw.
I lived within her ghostly glow,
Yet life itself seemed not to flow.
To walk alive yet feel like death,
Each breath a battle, each gasp bereft.

When she returned, I dared to dream,
That love could reignite from embers lean.
But though she came, her touch was cold,
No warmth of yesteryears to hold.
Instead, she brought lessons stark and bare—

How to fight despair, how not to care.

Once, her hands had crafted flavors sweet,
Now they stripped away what hearts repeat.
Our pact was to preserve the fragrance,
Each bloom's essence tucked within your pages.
Yet what I kept in those leaves—
Had I left that blossom untouched,
Its sweetness would linger still, eternal, in my mind's embrace.

Did I love her? Or did I forget?
Or did my heart just lose its bet?
For now, I wander through this void,
By memories both blessed and destroyed.
I lingered, hoping one day someone might
Pluck this foolish heart of mine.
And carry me close, as her own keepsake.

So here I stand, caught between times,
Haunted by echoes, broken rhymes.
Her absence carved me deep and wide,
Her presence failed to heal the tide.
Perhaps it's time to let her go,
To find myself where wild winds blow.

