

Unnamed, Alone

They speak of love in stages seven - Attraction first, then bonds we've woven, then love itself, then reverence deep, Then worship, where devotion sleeps, Obsession next, consuming whole, And death - the silence of the soul. But I do not know where I stand - This journey feels unplanned.

There was a time my eyes would rain, I begged the world to bring her back again, I cried at night, I cried till dawn, just to undo the day she was gone.

Then life - that quiet, clever thief - Gave me my wish, but not relief, she came again, I held her near, yet something hollow still lived here, we broke apart, but soft and slow, no storm this time, no bitter blow, The pain was different - calm, unclear, A quiet ache that would not clear.

Now every song that plays at night, every shayari I write, every scene, every fading tune, speaks of a love - not her - too soon, A blank white page, no face in sight, no eyes, no smile, just fading light, as if the love forgot her name, and left behind only the flame.

My friends are tying knots of white, and marriage enters my quiet night, but how do I give my life away, to one who does not know my day, how do I trust another soul, when mine still feels so far from whole.

Where will I find the girl who sings the old worn songs the nineties bring, who reads the words I write each night, and calls my broken verses right - Not just the lines that shine and gleam, but those half torn, still in between.

Who becomes the color when I paint, the gentle tint without complaint, who eats the food I cook with care, and tastes the love that lingers there - Who knows a meal is more than taste, a quiet labor, never waste.

Who walks with me to temple light, where silence prays through candle bright, who hears the tales of ancient lore, and listens like she has not heard before - Who finds the sacred in the old, not just in stone, but truths retold.

Who moves in dance with grace and fire, whose rhythm answers my desire, who sings the next line when I pause, and finishes it without a flaw - As if her voice was always there, Waiting inside my every prayer.

Who watches stars with me at night, and shows me stars within her sight, whose eyes themselves become the sky, reflecting every love gone by - Not distant lights too far to hold, but warmth that never turns to cold.

Who plays with passion, plays to win, matching the fire I hold within, who values worth above the gold, and chooses heart when truth is told - who understands that love's true test, is not the gift, but who gives best.

Who finds the brush I laid to rest, and paints new colors on my chest, who wakes the art I left behind, and gives it breath within my mind - Not asking why the strokes went still, just teaching hands to trust and will.

I love to teach, to guide, to give, where will I find the one who wants to live as my student, patient, willing, true, who lets me pour what little I still know into her too.

But if one girl cannot be all, if only pieces answer call, then tell me what I have to lose - My love or life, which one I choose, they call a wife the missing half, but half a love feels like a laugh, if she cannot complete the whole, then how is that a loving soul.

Is there a girl in this loud age, whose eyes can still write love's own page, can just one glance still hold romance, A lifetime folded in one chance, can silence still contain such art, that eyes alone can speak the heart.

I lost the thought of loving true, I lost the way I saw myself - unproven and unpursued, I lost the hope a bride would come, I lost the beat inside love's drum, I lost the will to watch it grow, I lost the fire I used to know.

And what remains is just this face - A canvas holding empty space, not blank from lack, but blank from all - the weight of every voice, every call, every song, every shade, every line, poured into a silence once called mine.

There is no proof, there is no gain, Only the hollow, only the pain, The void does not repay what's lost - It only counts the growing cost.

I do not know if love was real, or just a wound I learned to feel, the page stays blank, the face still gone, and I remain - unnamed, alone.